

College students have difficulty splitting shared expenses with roommates because tracking who owes what becomes confusing over time. Payments are made at different times, in different amounts, and for various expenses—such as rent, groceries, and utilities—which introduces further room for error. As a result, charges may be overlooked, calculated incorrectly, or divided unevenly.